Central Asian Transport Corridor

NICK YAO 姚树红

Significance of Developing Transport Corridor Resource sharing and connectivity 1. Coming in and going out 2. Developing and sharing effective resources 3. Leveraging regional economic development • Government support (E.g. the Belt and Road Initiative supported by the Chinese government) offers benefits and facilitation Development of global economy and trading regime irreversibly advances economic integration Trade exists as a result of regional differences Companies seek further progress and breakthroughs

Transport Corridor: Prospects

全国际

Stability and favorable development of the eleven countries in Central Asia offer an eased and secure macroeconomic environment guaranteed and supported by access to funding.

Economic complementarities as preconditions

Investment relations serves as a robust driver for cooperation between Central Asian countries

Companies' capacity to grow and business opportunities

Transport Corridor: Existing Problems

Development in its infancy, far from being mature; much effort needed in various aspects (huge cost and expenditure)

Lack of resource sharing, with certain gaps to be bridged; time-consuming and not costeffective

Governments in relevant countries have yet to issue favorable documents on checkpoint connectivity (E.g. lower charges for filing checkpoint papers and subsidies)

Existing resources developed are unable to cover the freight charges.

Member countries are yet to be interconnected.

Transport Corridor: Current Plan

• Explore resources from multiple sources to lower cost

Seek government support and help

Step up exchanges for effective use of resources of one another

_......

Prioritize trade between member countries along the corridor and gradually expand cooperation outside the region

.....

Leverage industry resources and encourage other companies for involvement and shared development

.....

Conduct industry-wise research to identify demand and needs; the eleven country alliance in Central Asia steps up research to develop closer market relations between member countries
